

SWITCHED

Le Whif Chocolate Inhaler Delivers Breathable Cocoa

BY TERRENCE O'BRIEN — MAR 4TH 2010 AT 8:28AM

Not all technology is geared towards putting a smaller, more powerful smartphone with amazing Web capabilities in your pants' pocket. Sometimes it's used to combine things like inhalers and chocolate bars into bizarre Frankenfoods, that fit in your pants' pocket.

Le Whif is the brainchild of Harvard University professor David Edwards and his lab students, who collectively figured out how break chocolate into tiny airborne particles and then deliver them through a modified medical inhaler. The result, marketed to be "as sweet as chocolate, as light as air," is now on store shelves in Paris, and will soon arrive in New York City and Cambridge.

Francis Cardullo, who owns Cardullo's Gourmet Shoppe in Harvard Square, told NPR that Le Whif delivers "the full flavor of the chocolate," which gives us high hopes for the new coffee-flavored, caffeine packing Whif that will be released on March 11. Best of all the Whif has zero calories, making it the perfect companion for the dieting chocolate-lover, who also happens to be ditching cigarettes. From: [NPR]

Tags: chocolate, coffee, food, inhaler, Le Whif, LeWhif, top

<http://www.switched.com/2010/03/04/le-whif-chocolate-inhaler-delivers-breathable-cocoa/>