BIG CITIES, SMALL DISTILLERIES

➔ THERE WAS A TIME WHEN D.I.Y. DISTILLERS were backcountry outlaws. These days it's urban hipsters, not hillbillies, who are bottling the country's best small-batch hooch. In the past ten years, the number of craft distilleries in the U.S. has exploded from around 35 to more than 750. Much of this boozy boom has been made possible by the loosening of draconian state and local laws that hadn't been touched since Prohibition, spurred both by opportunistic, seen-the-light legislators—the taxes! the tourism dollars!—and dogged young liquor makers willing to lobby the government to secure their inalienable right to party. Above, the bottles we'd race the Duke boys for. —AMIEL STANEK
